MISS MINCHIN,
Select Seminary for Young Ladies.

'Here we are, Sara', said Captain Crewe, making his voice sound as cheerful as possible. Then he lifted her out of the cab and they rang the bell. Miss Minchin entered the room. She was very like her house, Sara felt: tall and dull, and respectable and ugly. She had large, cold eyes, and a large, cold smile.

'It will be a great privilege to have such a beautiful and promising child, Captain Crewe', she said, taking Sara's hand. 'A clever child is a great treasure in a school like mine'. Sara stood quietly, looking at Miss Minchin's face.

'Why does she say I am a beautiful child?' she thought. 'I am not beautiful at all. Colonel Grange's little girl, Isobel, is beautiful. She has dimples, and rose-coloured cheeks, and long hair the colour of gold. I have short black hair and green eyes, and I am thin. I am one of the ugliest children one can see'.

She was wrong, however, in thinking she was an ugly child. She was not like Isobel Grange, but she had charm of her own. She was a thin creature, rather tall for her age, and had an attractive little face. Her hair was heavy and black and only curly at the tips; her eyes were greenish grey, it was true, but they were big, wonderful eyes with long, black lashes, and though she herself did not like the colour of them, many other people did.

Sara stood near her father and listened while he and Miss Minchin talked.
